IV. Reading

Read the text and choose the best answers.

Here's a question for you: are personality tests accurate or are they a waste of time? My main reason for asking this question is that I recently took a test in a popular science magazine and it told me that I would be a good nursery teacher. I have to say, I was rather surprised as I've never had any interest in working with kids and, in fact, when my cousins were young, I used to complain about their behaviour all the time! So do you think I should change my career based on this personality test?

To be honest, I think I might have been better off just reading my horoscope. After all, they're as scientific as most personality tests, in my opinion. I certainly don't think the human resources department of a big company would hire someone based on their horoscope or any other such nonsense.

So I was quite interested when I found a report on some research conducted by Northwestern University and published by Nature Research. Previously, many scientific reports concluded that it was impossible to classify personality types. But these researchers claim they have come up with the first scientifically accurate approach that works. The first thing that struck me was the amount of data they had used. It turns out that they analysed the results of three different online questionnaires answered by more than one and a half million people. Thanks to the Internet, it is now possible to investigate using enormous amounts of data that people give voluntarily.

According to their findings, there are four distinct personality types and most people fall into one of these categories: average, reserved, self-centred or role model. Of course, you can probably guess from the names that the majority of people are average, that role models are good leaders, that reserved people are not extroverts and that self-centred people aren't very pleasant to be with!

Also, the researchers found that certain groups of people were more likely to be represented in one category than other groups of people. One such group is young males, who are overrepresented in the self-centred group, while adult women are noticeably underrepresented.

So, where do I sit on the reliability of personality tests, now that I've read the report? Personally, I don't think I've really changed my mind. Yes, the amount of data is amazing. But can we really find out about someone's personality by getting them to answer a series of questions? And, even if we can, does this information help us decide what jobs people would be suited to? Aren't things like IQ (or intellectual intelligence) and EQ (or emotional intelligence) more important? The more I think about it, the more I think that other factors play a significantly bigger role in the career someone chooses than what kind of personality they have.

- A. is worried about the results of a personality test.
- B. is unsure whether personality tests are useful.
- C. talks about the research she has conducted into personality tests.

22. The writer thinks that horoscopes ..

- A. are just as reliable as personality tests.
- B. are often used by companies when they are hiring employees.
- C. tell us a lot about a person's personality.

23. When she read about the research by Northwestern University, she...

- A. thought it must have been done by a journalist.
- B. was bored by the amount of data it included.
- C. realised it was a very detailed piece of research.

24. The research shows that many young males ...

- A. have an average personality type.
- B. are self-centred.
- C. are in the same personality group as adult women.

25. After reading the report, the writer ...

- A. has changed her mind about personality tests.
- B. thinks that personality tests are a good way of helping people choose a job.
- C. thinks choosing a job is more complicated than just looking at the results of a personality test.

Imagine that you recently ordered some computer games online. When the games arrived – ten days late – the packaging was damaged and some of the games were missing. Write a letter of complaint to the company and demand a solution.

You should:

- say why you are writing.
- describe what happened.
- say what solution you want.
- say what you will do if there is no solution.

Use some of these phrases:

- I am writing to complain about ...
- However, ...
- What's more, ..
- I am very disappointed with ...
- I expect ...
- I demand that ...
- If I do not hear from you, ...
